The term $\dot{\alpha} v o ́ \pi \alpha 1 \alpha$, translated here as "upward", is of uncertain meaning. For a full discussion of the possibilities, including "a smoke vent", see A Commentary on Homer's Odyssey, v. 1. Introduction and Books I-VIII ed. Alfred Heubeck, Stephanie West, J.B. Hainsworth, 115-116. They suggest the possibility that this may be a transformation rather than a simile.

But he saw them one and all fallen in the blood and dust／many，like fish that fishermen／have drawn forth upon the curving beach from the grey sea／in the meshes of their net，and they all／lie heaped upon the sand，longing for the waves of the sea，／ and bright Helios（Sun）takes away their life；／thus then the suitors lay heaped upon each other．
［the suitors $\approx$ fish on a beach］Narrator
Sluiter 2014 compares similes relating fish to Odysseus＇men in Bk 12 \＃3（251）and to the suitors in Bk 22 \＃3（384）．

And as when long－winged thrushes or doves／fall into a snare that is set in a thicket，／as they seek to reach their resting－place，and hateful is the bed that gives them welcome，／thus the［women］held their heads in a row，and round the necks of all／

\#2* (103) [Penelope's heart $\approx$ harder than stone]
\#3 (158) [Odysseus' hair $\approx$ a hyacinth flower]
\#5 (191) [olive tree $\approx$ a pillar in girth]

'They lay one on the other; your <Penelope's> heart would have been warmed, seeing / him <Odysseus> befouled with blood and filth, like a lion.'
[Odysseus bloodied amid the bodies of the slain suitors $\approx$ a lion] Eurycleia
Note: Line 48 of Book 23 does not appear in the Perseus text. The Stanford 1959 text shows line 48 as being identical to Book 22 line 402, which is listed above as simile #4 in Book 22 above. Many editors consider the line spurious here (23.48) and omit it. ***
