Central Eurasian Studies Society

16th Annual Conference
Central Eurasian Studies Society

Central Asia program, IERES
George Washington University
October 15-18, 2015
The Central Eurasian Studies Society

Based in North America, CESS is an international organization for scholars concerned with the Central Eurasian region. The Central Eurasian Studies Society (CESS) seeks to promote high standards of research and teaching, to foster communication among scholars of Central Asia through meetings and social networking, and to facilitate interaction among scholars at different stages in their career and in different places around the world. Created in 2000, the society presents various forums for the presentation of research including CESS’s annual conference and the biannual Regional Conference; awards annual prizes (including the graduate student paper award and the book award), and provides members with the opportunity to present research informally through the CESS Blog. CESS also offers members discounted prices for subscriptions to peer-reviewed publications, such as Central Asian Survey and Central Asian Affairs.

Welcome!

Welcome to the 16th Annual Conference of the Central Eurasian Studies Society!

The Central Eurasian Studies Society (CESS) plays a critical role in consolidating state-of-the-art research on the Central Eurasian region. It accomplishes this not only by helping the field to institutionalize and achieve recognition among those ‘area studies’ that are already well established, but also by further integrating it into social sciences and the humanities and promoting interdisciplinary studies. The challenges ahead are numerous: not only has funding for fundamental research, language skills and fieldwork been in steady decline for several years, but the political conditions have deteriorated in many countries of the Central Eurasian region.

However, there are also many positive benchmarks to celebrate: a new generation of scholars is emerging and has a more intimate knowledge of the region and of local languages. This new generation is able to better incorporate its area focus in current general theoretical discussions in the social sciences and humanities with greater comparative skills than before. This new generation is also in the process of overcoming the supposed divide between ‘Western’ and ‘local’ scholars: many young and mid-career scholars from North America and Europe are able to spend several years in the region doing research and teaching, and many of their Central Eurasian colleagues have had the opportunity to pursue a PhD or acquire a post-doctoral fellowship in the ‘West’. Some of the most innovative research is now also coming from Asia, especially Japan. Our field is becoming more genuinely internationalized, which should help us face the above-mentioned challenges.

This year, the Conference is being hosted by the Central Asia Program (CAP) at the Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies (IERES). The Program was launched in 2012 through a grant from the Elliott School’s SOAR initiative. The Program promotes state-of-the-art academic research on contemporary Central Asia and acts as an interface for the policy, academic, diplomatic, and business communities working on and in the region. The Program fosters a multidisciplinary approach by combining the fields of political science, history, sociology, anthropology, cultural studies, economics, globalization studies, development studies, and security studies. It concentrates on the five post-Soviet states (Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan), as well as Afghanistan, Azerbaijan, Xinjiang, and Mongolia.

The Central Asia Program publishes several online policy briefs each month, as well as a peer-reviewed quarterly, Central Asian Affairs, and has recently launched a book series, Contemporary Central Asia: Societies, Politics and Cultures, with Lexington, an imprint of Rowman and Littlefield. The Central Asia Program hosts several initiatives focused on specific areas of research and development: the Central Asian Analytical Network, a digital regional think tank featuring young Central Asian experts and promoting local voices on topics of critical importance in domestic and international affairs; the CERIA (Central Eurasia—Religion in International Affairs) initiative, which promotes a better understanding of religion as a “societal shaper” with broader implications on politics, the economy, and culture; the Cultures and Societies initiative, which contributes to the study of Central Asian cultures as living entities that interact with politics and the economy, and reflect current social changes in the region; and several country- or region-focused projects on Kazakh, Uzbek, or Uyghur Studies.

I am very grateful to all those who participated in sponsoring this 2015 annual conference: The Elliott School’s Dean Office, the Institute for European, Russian and Eurasian Studies (IERES), and the University of Wisconsin-Madison Partnership with Nazarbayev University.

I also thank all the members of CESS and George Washington University who volunteered their time.

CESS Conference Committee Chair and Conference Host
Dear Colleagues and Friend,

It is when we come together at the CESS conferences and see our colleagues and the exciting work that they are doing that we can really get a sense of how our field of Central Eurasian studies is developing and maturing. As I am someone who began his studies of Central Eurasia at a time when the scholarship on the region was scarce and deeply fragmented—with little scholarly exchange between scholars of the present and the past, scholars of the western side of the region with scholars of the eastern side, and especially scholars from within the region and those from without—it is with tremendous satisfaction that I see us coming together as we are doing now for the 16th annual CESS conference.

As the field has matured, the increasing quality in scholarship is equally impressive, with greater interdisciplinary collaboration, stronger theoretical grounding, and much better integration of our scholarship into more global disciplinary discourses. We see new challenges now, with diminishing resources for scholarship on the region, and in some parts of the region, new impediments to research and cooperation. These challenges make what we do at this conference even more important. It is a treasure and a privilege to be able to come together as we do. Let us make the most of this, by intellectually engaging and collegially supporting the contributions to scholarship that our Society seeks to foster through this event.

I extend a welcome to you on behalf of the CESS Board, whether this is your 16th CESS annual conference, or your first—hopefully of many more.

John Schoeberlein, Nazarbayev University, CESS President-elect
Announcement

Seventeenth Annual Conference of the Central Eurasian Studies Society

November 3-6, 2016
Princeton University, Princeton, NJ, United States

The Central Eurasian Studies Society (CESS) will hold its Seventeenth Annual Conference, to be hosted by Princeton University, on November 3-6, 2016. The subject matter of the conference includes all fields of social sciences and humanities. For the purposes of the Central Eurasian Studies Society, the geographical extent of Central Eurasia reaches from the Caucasus, Black Sea and Middle Volga in the west to Tibet, Western China and Mongolia in the east, and from Iran and Afghanistan in the south to regions of Siberia in the north.

The host of the conference will be the Program in Russian, East European, and Eurasian Studies, and the Princeton Institute for International and Regional Studies, Princeton University.

Further Information and Submission of Proposals
A detailed Call for Papers will be issued in January 2016. The deadline for submissions will be in March 2016.
The conference information will be available at:

During the whole duration of the convention, you are welcome to visit the art exhibition

Old Patterns, New Order. Socialist Realism in Central Asia

Under Soviet rule, artists across Central Asia created images that both embraced modernity and idealized the past. This exhibition examines the Socialist Realist art movement in Central Asia, pairing twentieth-century paintings with examples of the traditional textiles they depict.

Location:
The George Washington University Museum/The Textile Museum, 701 21st Street, NW
Wednesday–Friday: 11:30am–18:30pm
Saturday: 10:00am–17:00pm
Sunday: 13:00-17:00pm

Docent-led tours for the convention participants are available on Friday, October 16, 16:15pm and 17.15pm

Every day huge trucks thunder through the Kyrgyz village of Barskoon. They are carrying a deadly freight: cyanide, which is used to extract gold at the nearby Kumtor goldmine. In 1998, one of the cyanide trucks crashes into the river that runs through the village. People die and hundreds of villagers fall ill. After seven years a handful of courageous women begin to fight for the rights of the victims. Erkingul and her fellow campaigners found a small environmental organization, block the road leading to the mine and eventually manage to secure compensation from the Kyrgyz-Canadian gold mine. When a revolution topples the government of President Bakiev in 2010, the women were at the forefront of the protests. Staying very close to the activists, this humorous film describes not only the political commitment displayed by these women in their struggle for justice, but also how people manage to survive in a Kyrgyz village.

Flowers of Freedom

Germany, 2014

The Magic of Mugham. Mystical Music of Azerbaijan, by Jeffrey Werbock

Jeffrey Werbock presents a program of instrumental solo improvisations based on traditional Azerbaijani mugham, played on oud - fretless wood face short neck lute; tar - fretted skin face long neck lute; and kamancha - skin face spike fiddle. Azerbaijani mugham is monophonic modal music, highly microtonal, meter free, densely ornamented, composed of complex melodic lines that are somewhat improvised according to the eastern tradition of theme and variation, and convey a mix of sorrow and joy, exaltation and lament, and an overall sense of both antiquity and otherworldliness.

Tales from the Steppes, an hour of traditional fairy tales from Central Asia performed by storyteller Dana Sherry

Come on an imaginary journey to the Central Asia of fairy tales, where you might be able to find your destiny and live happily ever after – if you have the courage and wisdom to survive the journey. Dana Sherry, Ph.D., is the Coordinator for Storytelling Programs and Resident Storyteller at the Silk Road House, a cultural center dedicated to the traditional arts of Central Asia and the Caucasus.

Keynote Speech by Alexander Cooley (Director, Harriman Institute, Columbia University)
Thursday, Oct. 15, 13:00-14:45 ♦
“Locating Central Asian Geopolitics: the Rise and Future Decline of Multivectorism in Practice”

Since independence in the early 1990s, scholars and commentators have broadly characterized the foreign policies of the Central Asian states as “multivector,” drawing attention to how these governments skillfully play great powers off on another and leverage external interest for their own political and economic self-interest. Central Asian multivectorism reached its peak in the 2000s following the regional entry of the United States as a security player in support of its Afghanistan operations, China’s spectacular economic rise, and Russia’s renewed attention to its post-Soviet sphere under the leadership of Vladimir Putin.

However, recent events suggest that post-2014, following the United States withdrawal from Afghanistan and the ongoing crisis in Ukraine, the Central Asian states will find it increasingly difficult to maintain the balance among external suitors, despite their considerable desire to do so. Post-2014 international relations in Central Asia will likely be more hierarchical than multivectoral, with Russia and China playing an increasingly dominant role in the security and economic spheres, respectively. By contrast, the United States and the west will lose interest, influence and normative power in the region, even in the event of a regional conflict or a turbulent political succession in one of the major states.

Friday, Oct. 16, 13:00-14:00 ♦

Jeffrey Werbock presents a program of instrumental solo improvisations based on traditional Azerbaijani mugham, played on oud - fretless wood face short neck lute; tar - fretted skin face long neck lute; and kamancha - skin face spike fiddle. Azerbaijani mugham is monophonic modal music, highly microtonal, meter free, densely ornamented, composed of complex melodic lines that are somewhat improvised according to the eastern tradition of theme and variation, and convey a mix of sorrow and joy, exaltation and lament, and an overall sense of both antiquity and otherworldliness.

Plenary Session 2 ♦ Friday, Oct. 16, 14:15-16:00

Keynote Speech by Madeleine Reeves (University of Manchester, UK)
Friday, Oct. 16, 14:15-16:00 ♦ Lindner Commons, Rm. 602
“Trace, Trajectory, Pressure Point: Re-imagining 'Area Studies' in an Age of Migration”

How might we reimagine Area Studies in an age of mass migration? The field of Central Eurasian Studies has come in for plenty of critique recently. In part this is criticism pointed at the politicization of the field: the tendency for our questions and our research agendas to be shaped by political agendas and interpretive categories that may hinder analysis rather than further it. In part the criticism is directed at a seeming failure to develop concepts and theories that might travel beyond the confines of the (geographical) field, or to think beyond and across the arbitrary boundaries of ‘Central Eurasia’.

In this talk Madeleine Reeves argues that part of the challenge of articulating an Area Studies that is neither insular nor atheoretical lies with the category of ‘Area’ itself, haunted as it is by a two-dimensional, Euclidian conception of space-as-container. Drawing on Doreen Massey’s critical reflections on the historicity and materiality of space and empirical research looking at new trajectories of migration for work, Madeleine explores three alternative idioms for thinking about the spaces of Central Asia. ‘Traces’ draw attention to the role of historical legacies in the way the articulation and imagination of space; including the way that present spatial formations are haunted by past ways of making and inhabiting space. ‘Trajectory’ points to attend to the movement and circulation of people, things and ideas, while ‘pressure point’ highlights the eventfulness of place and the need to think the spatial and the political together.

CU-03 ♦ Art Exhibition “Old Patterns, New Order Socialist Realism in Central Asia”
The GW Museum/The Textile Museum, 701 21st Street, NW
Under Soviet rule, artists across Central Asia created images that both embraced modernity and idealized the past. This exhibition examines the Socialist Realist art movement in Central Asia, pairing twentieth-century paintings with examples of the traditional textiles they depict. This will be a docent-led visit.

To attend, you should register at:
go.gwu.edu/exhibition415 for the visit at 4.15pm

CU-04 ♦ Cinemaclub: Khadak (Mongolia, Belgium, 2006)
Friday, Oct. 16, 19:00-20:30 ♦

“Eerie, muddled and gorgeous, Khadak tells the story of an epileptic Mongolian sheepherder named Bagi (Batzul Khayankhyarvaa) who embraces his destiny as a shaman when his village is threatened. Shot on arid steppes, in rural villages and amid the remains of monolithic Soviet-era buildings, it has ecological and religious dimensions and a hero who undergoes several transformations. After that Khadak becomes an account of Mongolia’s shift from a rural to an industrial economy; a rebellion narrative in which Bagi joins vagabond musicians opposing their oppressive government; and a metaphysical adventure in which the hero is projected into a bleak future.” (Matt Zoller Seitz for the New York Times, http://www.nytimes.com/2007/10/12/movies/12khad.html?_r=1&)

"Regional vs. International Scholarship in Eurasian Studies: Tensions between Hierarchy and Engagement”

We face great challenges to promote a globally integrated field of Eurasian studies that functions on the premise that “we are all in it together”—in the sense that we all need to strive for common standards of quality, of integrity, and of how to approach our subject, at the same time as respecting difference. Like it or not, there are global hierarchies, reinforced by power, access to resources, and authority that is not simply based “the strongest scholarly argument”, that result in certain scholars and institutions constituting a “core” in relation to which others are peripheral and thus have a weaker position in the international production of scholarship. At the same time, we think we are justified in believing that there was much that was wrong with Soviet scholarship—due to its isolation, subjection to political-ideological agendas, and its own institutional power dynamics that marginalized scholars who were more junior or were located outside of central, authoritative institutions. And we think that the legacy of these problems remains strong—and has been further exacerbated by new trends such as nationalist ideologies and the collapse of support for scholarly pursuits in many places. Yet, how can we accept this kind of hierarchical discourse without engaging in intellectual imperialism?

This panel examines the questions of what we are up against if we wish to engage with one another across the divide between “Western” and “regional” scholarship, and other such divides, without having that engagement to be dominated by the premise that if regional scholars want to participate on a level that is up to “international” (America and Europe-dominated) standards, then they need to “adopt our standards, our methods, our concepts, our assumptions.” What kinds of collaboration are possible that do not hinge on an embrace of this hierarchy? What strategies are available to us to de-marginalize regional scholarship? To what extent is it inevitable that regional scholarship should undergo "reform", acquire new qualifications, achieve Western recognition? And to what extent are we ready to embrace the notion that the only path to good scholarship is to shed local standards and practices and to adopt “international” ones?
Every day huge trucks thunder through the Kyrgyz village of Barskoon. They are carrying a deadly freight: cyanide, which is used to extract gold at the nearby Kumtor goldmine. In 1998, one of the cyanide trucks crashes into the river that runs through the village. People die and hundreds of villagers fall ill. After seven years – in which the Kyrgyz government does nothing – a handful of courageous women begin to fight for the rights of the victims. Erkingul and her fellow campaigners found a small environmental organization, block the road leading to the mine and eventually manage to secure compensation from the Kyrgyz-Canadian gold mine.

When a revolution topples the government of President Bakiev in 2010 the women are at the forefront of the protests. After the first democratic election, Erkingul manages to secure a seat in parliament and continues to lead the fight against the gold mine as a politician. Her friends stay behind in the village. Staying very close to the activists, this humorous film describes not only the political commitment displayed by these women in their struggle for justice, but also how people manage to survive in a Kyrgyz village.

RE-01 ♦ Academic publishing in Central Eurasian studies: a workshop with the editors of Central Asian Survey"
Sunday, Oct. 18, 11:00-12:45 ♦

This workshop is intended to give participants an insight into the process of scholarly publishing from an editorial perspective. Led by Raphael Jacquet, the Editorial Manager at Central Asia Survey and with the participation of members of the journal's editorial board, this 'hands on' session will give an insight into the process of scholarly publishing from manuscript submission to published article. It will consider common reasons why articles are rejected, the process of peer review, considerations of audience, discipline and reach, and the challenges of article revision. It will also address the broader landscape of scholarly publishing and the role of area studies journals. Brief presentations will be followed by a Q&A and open-ended discussion.
