Abraham Newman
Associate Professor, Georgetown University

Abe Newman is an associate professor at Georgetown’s School of Foreign Service. His research focuses on international political economy, with a special interest in global regulatory issues. His work examines the intersection of comparative and international political economy, specifically how domestic institutions, through transgovernmental cooperation, shape international affairs. Professor Newman is the author of Protectors of Privacy: Regulating Personal Data in the Global Economy (Cornell University Press: 2008) and co-editor of How Revolutionary was the Digital Revolution: National Responses, Market Transitions, and Global Technologies (Stanford University Press: 2006). His work has appeared in a range of journals including Governance, International Organization, and the Journal of European Public Policy. Professor Newman received his BA in International Relations from Stanford University and his PhD in political science from the University of California, Berkeley.
