Part of IERES’s Behind the Headlines Series

Othon Anastasakis
Director, European Studies Center, St. Antony’s College, Univ. of Oxford

Up until the start of the financial crisis, the countries of Southern Europe were considered very successful cases of democratic consolidation and approximation with the developed West and were models for the post-communist transition states of Central and Eastern Europe. The Eurozone crisis, however, exposed both the fallacy of convergence between the north and south of Europe and the discrepancies between the strong surplus economies of the north versus the weaker deficit economies of the south. This seminar will discuss this new dividing line between Europe’s northern “core” and southern “periphery” and consider those political, economic, and social trends which are common to “peripheral” countries.

Dr. Othon Anastasakis is Director of the European Studies Centre, St Antony's College, University of Oxford; Director of South East European Studies at Oxford (SEESOX); and Senior Research Fellow at the Department of Politics and International Relations, University of Oxford.
