Environmental Crime and Corruption in Russia
Part of IERES's Behind the Headlines Series with

Sally Stoecker
Scholar in Residence, American University

The recently published Environmental Crime and Corruption in Russia: Federal and Regional Perspectives provides new insights into environmental challenges in several regions of the Russian Federation. All but one of the authors is a native Russian scholar who examined a diverse set of problems with global implications, such as the protection and disposal of nuclear waste and the impact of air and water pollution on the incidence of chronic disease. In this presentation, one of the book’s co-editors will provide an overview of the contributors’ findings and answer questions from the audience.

Sally Stoecker is a Scholar in Residence in the School of International Service at American University. Since the mid-1990s she has been researching crime and corruption in Eurasia, Asia, and Europe. Her research career began in 1982 at the RAND Corporation. Since then she has worked for several NGOs, including the Transnational Crime and Corruption Center, Shared Hope International, and Court Appointed Special Advocates. She has spent considerable time in the field doing research in Siberia and the Russian Far East. This year Routledge published Environmental Crime and Corruption in Russia: Federal and Regional Perspectives, which she co-edited with Dr. Ramziya Shakirova.
